Robust research on personnel retention tells us that two often overlooked, but proven variables are key to staff retention and well-being: voice and appreciation. This workshop boosts clinical leaders' skill to enhance both. There will be practical exercises to plan and practice two conversational techniques leaders can enact to create a magnetic, high-performance, and compassionate culture around them. The first highlights "the value of being valued" to build a culture of appreciation. The second focuses on improving performance in everyday clinical practice by holding people to high standards while holding them in high regard. Participants can expect to leave with two practical interventions they can apply immediately and relying on Jenny's 20 years coaching clinical leaders, up the learning curve on these skills. Maybe it's an awkward phrase in a department or family meeting, an ill-timed joke in rounds, or a bit of blunt feedback that came out way sharper than you intended. Or worse—you're watching a conversational train wreck unfold in real time, but you're stuck in the passenger seat, white-knuckling it as someone barrels past the guardrails of psychological safety. What now? How do you course-correct before things derail completely?
